The Untouchable: the roman-à-clef | Books | The Guardian

John Banville's The Untouchable (1997) gives imaginative life to what Lord Annan, then Provost of King's College, Cambridge, described as "the long-running inquest upon the culture, morality, and patriotism of intellectuals" brought about by the "saga of the Cambridge spies." The artistry of the novel is, indeed, no less captivating than the reality from which it draws — the double life of Anthony Blunt, who juggled the intense secrecy of a spy with the public stature of a ...
